ACKNOWLEDGMENT

The members of the Board of Editors are grateful to those members of the Class of 1980 whose efforts assured the future of the law journal. We are equally grateful to those members of the Antioch School of Law community whose varied contributions to the journal assured its publication. THIS COMPLETES VOLUME ONE OF THE ANTIOCH LAW JOURNAL.

In 1976 I was deeply touched when the Antioch School of Law honored me with its Urban Justice Award.

Now I am being honored again by the dedication of this first issue of the Antioch Law Journal. I am pleased by this gesture on behalf of the most innovative law school ever to be accredited by the American Bar Association. I am impressed that Antioch continues to produce a student body which actively commits itself to fulfilling the legal needs of socio-economically disadvantaged people.

The importance of Antioch's approach to law cannot be overestimated. Only by upholding the rights of the oppressed minorities may the majority gain solace in knowing that they, too, will find justice in their lifetime. Only by faithfully incorporating the concept of "liberty and justice for all" can the constitutional principles of "due process," "equal protection," and "privileges and immunities" preserve the integrity of our people and of our government. Towards these ends, may the vigilance of the Antioch Law Journal help us in keeping the faith.

William O. Douglas

Dedication of the Law Journal

The Antioch School of Law was founded for the purpose of blending an altruistic vision of social justice with scholarship, skill development and community service. The Law School's mission focuses on the promotion of social justice, particularly on behalf of underprivileged people who by reason of race, indigency and/or sex have experienced unequal access to justice. This mission requires a harmony of professional competence and human compassion.

As we apparently now enter an era of retrenchment in this nation's commitment to the poor and minorities, the need for legal activism on behalf of these most vulnerable constituencies will become increasingly important. To be effective, that activism must be honed by good judgment, careful research and incisive analysis.

Towards this end, the Antioch Law Journal is now born. It is a journal that offers further evidence of the Antiochian tradition that strives to combine community service with scholarly pursuits. It is a journal dedicated to enlightening and enlivening the law-related professions to act effectively in the public interest—a dedication well exemplified by the life of Justice William O. Douglas who graced us with inspirational thoughts in anticipation of an inaugural edition of this Law Journal.

On behalf of the Antioch community, I congratulate the Law Journal's editors and staff, as well as faculty supervisor Frank Munger, for their good and hard work in preparing this edition. It will serve as a fine example for future editions. I hope that the Law Journal's scholarly growth in ensuing years will be exceeded only by this nation's rekindled commitment to equal justice for all.
